More than 10,000 global listeners already tune in to The Unseen Realm, making it a rare life seeking clarity in real time. “We are bridging a gap,” explains Archbishop Enright. “Too often suffering from unexplained phenomena feel trapped between skepticism and superstition offers hope, insight, and real answers.”

The program’s format sets it apart: callers from around the world share experiences ranging from suspected hauntings to possible demonic possession. Each case is met with balanced perspectives from the clergy panel, and clinical insights from the psychiatrist. This ensures that listeners receive guidance that respects both spiritual and medical considerations.

Beyond live interaction, the podcast also revisits historical cases. Past episodes have covered reports from the Order of Exorcists’ members in 24 countries and practical protocols for both clinicians and laypeople. These sessions highlight not just the severity of true cases but also the importance of responsibly debunking myths.

Our jurisdiction is not under the Vatican. We identify ourselves as traditional, independent Catholics. We are autonomous from the Vatican. The following Vatican document clarifies this to the wider Catholic body: “Dominus Iesus” (2000 AD), a declaration of the Holy See by then Cardinal Ratzinger (now Benedict XVI, Pope Emeritus) and Tarcisio Cardinal Bertone under the authority of His Holiness Pope John Paul II: “One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one Church. Churches united to the Catholic Church by means of the closest bonds of Apostolic Succession and are true particular Churches.”

Interest in the paranormal peaks during the Halloween season, but Enright stresses the need for a grounded approach. Research suggests that while 82% of reported paranormal events have rational explanations, 18% remain unexplained. The Unseen Realm exists precisely in this space, where unanswered questions meet expert guidance.

Available free to the public through YouTube, the show makes a unique invitation: anyone can join the conversation. The live, call-in format ensures that listeners are not just passive consumers but active participants in a global dialogue about the unseen dimensions of human experience.
